OF THE PUBLISHER

Since the publication of the first volume of this Dictionary, many important works on French lexicography have been published and others are preparing for the press.

These works, which attest the great importance attached at the present day to the study of the French language, have compelled us to extend our researches, and, in order to secure the conscientious fulfilment of our undertaking, have required on our part the most scrupulous care and attention.

The nomenclature has been enriched with nearly all the terms used in modern science, and, as far as concerns the language in a purely literary point of view, we have adopted many neologisms, the employment of which by writers of high merit has constituted sufficient authority, and we have even admitted certain slang terms and expressions which, of late years, have become of familiar usage.

To afford room for so many new words, we have omitted a great number of others, vulgar or little used, and, in order that even the most scrupulous mother should be able to place our dictionary in the hands of her daughter, we have carefully expunged all those expressions which have but too long sullied the pages of dictionaries in general use.

The pronunciation based on the authority of the first orthoepists of our day, has been "figured" for the English reader on the same principle as that employed in the first volume, and the literary men of the two countries whom we have consulted, are of opinion that the relative exactitude of the different sounds is as nearly perfect as possible.

We have taken particular pains with the etymology in the English-French part, on account of the great variety of sources from which the words are derived; we have also given the origin of the Radicals and their affinity with modern languages; but in the French-English part, where nearly all the non-scientific words are derived from the Latin, it has, in most cases, been found sufficient to give only the origin of the word itself.

We have experienced our greatest difficulty with the definitions, and, on this difficulty we have concentrated our utmost efforts. Every one knows that the same word may have many and different meanings; but those only who have laboured at the work can fully comprehend what reflection, tact and patience are necessary to discover which of these acceptations ought to be taken as a starting-point; how this acceptance creates a second and then a third. If the path we must follow to arrive at these successive and various acceptations or meanings be once lost sight of, the logical sequence is interrupted, and utter confusion is the result.

In following out the logical order of ideas, it has been our intention not only to deduce, one from the other, the gradual shades of meaning, but also to render palpable to the reader the manner in which this transformation has been effected, by indicating whether the sense arises from "extension", "analogy", or "irony"; whether it is figurative or otherwise, etc., etc.; each sense bears a distinguishing number and is preceded by its French definition.

Numerous quotations from the best ancient and contemporary writers elucidate every part of the work; in consulting the Dictionary, the importance and practical utility of this system are clearly manifest, as the examples given prevent the possibility of one sense being taken for another; at the same time, the exact and well classified value of each term to be employed is clearly given. In the choice of examples, care has been taken to find those which give an uncommon meaning or sense, are difficult to translate into English, and those, especially, which give the solution of a grammatical difficulty; this is one of the characteristic features of our work.

The idioms, which in most dictionaries are put all together at the end of each article, are here placed under their respective meanings, so that one perceives at a glance the literal sense of the phrase side by side with the equivalent in English.

We feel sure that the importance of this will be fully appreciated by students.

Paris, May 1865.
